States, People and the History of Social Change

A major new international series

Edited by Rosalind Crone (The Open University) and Heather Shore (Leeds Beckett University)

Overview

States, People and the History of Social Change will bring together cutting-edge books written by academic historians on criminal justice, welfare, education, health and other areas of social change and social policy. The way in which states, governments and localities have responded to 'social problems' is identifiable in many different temporal and geographical contexts. From the early modern to the modern period states have attempted to shape the lives of their people in important ways. Books in this series explore the ways in which groups and individuals have negotiated that process. The series will welcome scholars from the UK, Europe and beyond, whose research explores social policy (and its earlier equivalents) and other responses to social need, in historical perspective.

The series editors will be joined by an international editorial board of five senior scholars representing the broad range of issues addressed by the series.
