Journalist Tom Bowker to be expelled Saturday

Tom Bowker, journalist and editor of the respected Zitamar newsletter, has been ordered to leave the country by Saturday. The expulsion is entirely unofficial - there is nothing in writing. Tom is British and has been a journalist in Mozambique for seven years; Zitamar is a company registered in the UK.

Bowker was called into the Migration Services with his lawyer on Monday (25 Jan) and told verbally that he had to leave by Saturday, based on a complaint from Gabinfo, the government information office. Mendes Mutenda, communications director of Gabinfo, told the new daily newspaper Ponto por Ponto (28 Jan <http://bit.ly/MozEdExpell>) that it has withdrawn Bowker's press card because he "failed to provide documents that prove that Zitamar exists."

Bowker had provided Zitamar's UK company registration (which is publicly available on the web) which proves it exists, and specifies "Nature of business: News agency activities." But Gabinfo demanded a press registration, and refused to accept the explanation from Bowker and British diplomats that the UK does not have any form of press registration.

In December, Egidio Vaz, a social media blogger who lauds President Filipe Nyusi, called for Bowker's expulsion because of his reporting of the Cabo Delgado war. But this is apparently the first expulsion of a foreign journalist in more than 30 years.

The real reason for the expulsion is not clear. But it will be widely argued outside that it is because Zitamar has been one of the best and most accurate reporters on the war in Cabo Delgado. Zitamar and MediaFax have a good network of correspondents there and with Aclad last year set up Cabo Ligado which is now the best weekly report on the war. The government has consistently been trying to prevent reporting of the war, and expelling Bowker may be seen as a way to stop Cabo Ligado and reporting of the war.

Zitamar is still mainly a business newsletter, and most major businesses have Frelimo links, so his investigations may have gotten too close to one of the oligarchs. And Frelimo is closing in on the press. Last August, the offices of Canal de Moçambique were firebombed, and journalists are increasingly threatened.

But it remains unclear whether Bowker really must leave, as he has been given no formal written notice. Hopefully he will be told that he and his lawyer misunderstood and it was merely a threat of what will happen if he keeps reporting on the war.

French navy already patrolling Mozambique Channel

The French frigate Nivôse is already patrolling the Mozambique coast and on 24 January captured a dhow with 417 kg of methamphetamine and 27 kg of heroin, according to press in France, Reunion and Mayotte (26 Jan). The frigate carries a Panther helicopter which was used to stop the dhow.

Last October (this newsletter 504, 22 Oct) we reported that crystal meth is now being produced in Afghanistan and shipped via Mozambique along with the heroin. A common shrub known locally as oman that grows abundantly across northern and central Afghanistan contains a naturally occurring form of ephedrine, a key precursor required to produce methamphetamine. This lowered production costs, allowed local production of high quality crystal meth, and provides an important new income for Afghan peasant farmers.

Could Total move offshore?

Africa Intelligence (26 Jan) says Total could move part of its operation from Cabo Delgado to Mayotte, an island 500 km east of Pemba. Mayotte is formally part of France, has a deep water port, a naval base, and a French foreign legion detachment, although the airstrip is not as long as the one at Afungi.

This is clearly a leak or briefing intended to put pressure on President Nyusi but also, perhaps on Total. But does it come from part of the Portuguese government, Total, or the Portuguese military? Unclear.

The natural gas liquification trains will still have to be built on Afungi and have heavy military protections. Africa Intelligence claims that the plan is to shift the base for logistics and staff from Palma and Pemba to Mayotte. It also claims that Total has already asked some subcontractors to assess the costs of moving to Mayotte. A range of French companies are involved in the Mozambican gas mega-project, and the newsletter says "French authorities for their part are fully in favour of the Mayotte option, which they see as the 'patriotic' choice." The French government is also promoting the development of Mayotte, which is one of the poorest departments of France.

Total told AIM today (28 Jan) that it was transferring some of its logistic chain and planning to Mayotte, but said that its main base would remain in Pemba and that it would continue to meet its Mozambican local content objectives.

Eloise flood waters going down slowly

Flood waters are going down slowly and the worst problems remain in Buzi. Evacuations to Guara-Guara not far upstream and slightly higher started before Eloise when the area was already flooded. It is intended that people will be resettled there. But the only way out of Buzi is by boat, and the fuel for the boats has run out. Hundreds of people who have lost everything are just waiting. (O Pais 27 Jan)

On Wednesday morning, the Buzi river had fallen below flood alert level while the Save and Pungue rivers remained high. Water from heavy rain in South Africa is now passing down the Limpopo river and should reach Xai Xai Friday; flooding is above alert level but not serious.

Unitar has posted three good flood maps: <https://www.unitar.org/maps/latest-maps> The latest from Tuesday (26 Jan) show the extensive flooding around Buzi and that Guara-Guara, just 20 km upstream, is not flooded. It also shows extensive flooding on the Pungue near Mafambisse, but that the main road to Beira remains open. Water levels are declining only slightly.

UN and government reports, including the government's excellent daily report on river levels, are posted on <http://bit.ly/Moz-flood21> and updated as soon as reports are received or discovered.
